I feel that it will be very useful for a possible future career in plasma and fusion physics research. Since particles no longer interact with each other at pressures of approximately  $10^{-2}$  mbar, the flow of particles changes from a viscous flow to a molecular flow. Therefore, the aim of my experiment was to examine how the heating rate affects the influx of Helium impurity via desorption. After a few days of pumping the chamber will reach a pressure of  $10^{-9}$  or  $10^{-10}$  mbar. Tungsten can release Helium back into the plasma. In this divertor region, the plasma facing components are bombarded by Helium particles and a part of this particle flux is being absorbed into the Tungsten material. Tungsten is the main component of EuroFer, which is used in Tokamaks such as ASDEX and JET. Reported by James Claxton. I predicted that a relatively low heating rate would mean that the Helium would have more time to desorb from the sample. During the summer of , I spent two months at the Plasma physics institute in Milan, doing an internship about the desorption of Helium from Tungsten. Fusion plasmas contain quite some Helium, since Helium is produced during the fusion reaction between Deuterium and Tritium. Photo of the Month.
